Topic Cangleska Model for Student Success
The student's experience in higher education is rooted in relationships built leading up to, throughout and beyond their college experience. These relationships are a response to the history, needs, and dreams of the student and their communities, they acknowledge the historical context and experience of Native communities, and their own tribally chartered institutions of higher education. In applying a framework that centers the student's life and relationships (they develop with each person and occurrence in their life) we identify needs to be met to sustain a healthy balance with those relationships and responsibilities that determine student success. Aspects of an indigenous student success paradigm are reflective of student and community worldview, AI/AN students experience this journey with all their being, not just their academic experience. As we explore this paradigm, an appreciation of the embeddedness and reciprocal nature of ideas and practices in this context, sets the stage for practitioners to engage student experiences and traditional practices in their complexity, not their individuality. To improve student engagement, learning, and

4:30 PM progress toward the students' goals through cross-functional leadership and the intentional application of traditional knowledge,
